The activists — an organization called Liberty Counsel and an affiliated attorney called the Center for Constitutional Jurisprudence — filed a lawsuit in Maryland District Court, asking the court to order the U.S. Supreme Court to allow the activists to distribute pamphlets in the high court's driveway and holding area, which is a public area accessed by the public. Despite the court's decision to bar the plaintiffs from their original objective of reaching the public, the plaintiffs have asked the court to modify its policy to allow distribution of literature in "an area that is open, visible, and where the public may reasonably gather." "Defendants are violating Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights by continuing to prevent Plaintiffs from freely distributing literature in a public area that is open and readily accessible to the general public," the lawsuit says. The lawsuit is not filed on behalf of the Supreme Court's three justices — two of whom are Republican appointees — but is filed on behalf of the court's "disinterested public." Justice Brett Kavanaugh, appointed to replace Justice Anthony Kennedy, filed a brief with the court as a respondent in this case.
